

The internet access providers function in every sense like a common carrier, and they should certainly be treated as such.

Net neutrality is the only sensible policy in the public interest. Any other policy simply benefits the near-monopoly power of internet access providers. It is absurd to consider the anti-competitive position of the proposed policy as "freedom" for anyone - except for access providers to extort unfettered profits from the public.